New Windsor, NY, July 22, 2021—Storm King Art Center will stage five site-responsive performances of Rashid Johnson's ballet, The Hikers, from August 20 to 21, 2021.

Adapted from the film and corresponding performances of the same title, The Hikers follows the journey of two solo hikers, both Black: first alone, then crossing each other's path—an encounter that unfolds in sometimes lithe, sometimes lumbering balletic movements, challenging modern conceptions of blackness and fetishizations of black bodies in motion. In collaboration with choreographer Claudia Schreier, Johnson explores the physical and psychological repercussions that attend the black body in space.

Originally debuted at the Aspen Art Museum in 2019, The Hikers has subsequently been performed at Hauser & Wirth in New York, with presentations of the film at Aspen Art Museum, Museo Tamayo in Mexico City, and Hauser & Wirth. At Storm King, the live performance takes new form when enacted outdoors in dialogue with the landscape—and shown in concert with Johnson's site-specific sculptural installation The Crisis, on view through November 8, 2021. All performances of The Hikers at Storm King will feature Lloyd Knight and Leslie Andrea Williams of the Martha Graham Dance Company.

Johnson said: "When Claudia Schreier and I created The Hikers in 2019, I was building on a specific experience hiking in Colorado, which led me to think heavily about outdoor activities and how they are or aren't democratized. The ballet built on this to address the body and identity in space, so translating these ideas in a different environment has been an incredibly interesting process—the anxieties and tensions the work addresses are universal, but the nuances of context play such a critical role."

STORM KING ART CENTER

Nora Lawrence, Storm King Senior Curator, said: “The way Rashid has reimagined these two incredible works—both of which so elegantly reflect the central currents of his practice—within the unique context of Storm King’s environment, is a testament to the subtlety and intention with which he conceives their relationship to site. Seen separately and together, the works become vehicles for an examination of identity: of the relationship between the natural and the mediated, and between the personal and the cultural. To be able to present them in dialogue with one another and with Storm King is a true gift.”

Responding directly to Storm King’s native landscape, The Crisis—a sixteen-foot-tall, yellow pyramidal steel structure—is set within a field of native grasses, which Storm King has reintroduced into its landscape and cultivated over the last 25 years. Over the course of the presentation, the grasses grow up within and around the geometric frame, integrating the work into the very fabric of Storm King. The structure’s shelves are populated with a range of smaller objects—including blocks of shea butter, sculpted fiberglass busts, and hand-crafted, painted ceramic vessels, planted with natural vegetation from the surrounding landscape. Johnson draws inspiration from combining architectural and organic elements, intending for The Crisis to capture the tension of the moment in which nature has just begun to reclaim a human-made structure.

Centrally located and viewable from both above and from a closer vantage point, the various physical approaches to the work invite a multitude of interpretations. The title The Crisis itself is ambiguous: The Crisis can speak both to something deeply personal as well as a collective event and can invoke both historical and ongoing crises. The color of Johnson’s work, in addition, evokes a multiplicity of meaning: the bright yellow of the frame and the sculpted busts contained within simultaneously signal a warning and reflect the color of shea butter—a West African product known for its healing properties, which frequently appears in Johnson’s practice. The Crisis at once calls upon viewers to beware and points to the regeneration that often follows trauma.

The Crisis (2019) is on loan to Storm King for the 2021 season from the artist and Hauser & Wirth.

Working across a variety of media, scales, and disciplines, The Hikers and The Crisis exemplify the breadth that distinguishes Johnson’s artistic practice. Reconceived for Storm King’s setting, the works taken together present a symphonic exploration of being in the world, interrogating and frequently collapsing the space between environment and both individual and collective notions of self.

Storm King will host a live talk between Johnson and Schreier for onsite audiences on the occasion of the ballet’s premiere.
