Kim Gordon's vision of art and noise has come sharper into focus just as readily as it's changed—a paradigm of possibility that, four decades on, still feels like a dare. Releasing her debut solo single, "Murdered Out," in 2016, Gordon launched a now-decade-long collaboration with Justin Raisen, an L.A. producer (Charli XCX, Sky Ferreira, Yves Tumor) with a preternatural grip on her "minimal, trashy" aesthetic. In 2019, Gordon's debut solo LP No Home Record proved she was attuned as ever to vanguard sounds, mixing avant-rap and footwork into her sonic conceptual art. The Collective, in 2024, was brickheavy and even more daring, led by the tectonic industrial clatter of her packing-list-cum-ragerap banger "BYE BYE" and earning two Grammy nominations. Play Me, her third solo album, processes, in Gordon's impressionistic way, the collateral damage of the billionaire class: the demolition of democracy, technocratic end-times fascism, the A.I.-fueled chill-vibes flattening of culture.

Black Country, New Road are a British experimental rock collective known for their fearless reinvention and genre-defying sound. From their Mercury Prize–nominated debut For the First Time to Ants from Up There, the band has continuously pushed boundaries. Their latest album, Forever Howlong, marks a bold new chapter with shared vocal and songwriting duties, inventive instrumentation, and expansive arrangements, showcasing a fearless exploration of post-punk, chamber pop, folk, and prog influences that cements the group as one of the most exciting voices in contemporary rock.

Horsegirl is a Chicagoborn, New York–based indie rock trio whose music blends postpunk, shoegaze, and experimental pop with a playful, spirited edge. Since signing to Matador Records, they’ve released two acclaimed albums—Versions of Modern Performance and their second LP Phonetics On and On—exploring space, texture, and songwriting with clarity and inventive minimalism. Known for their chemistry and creative growth, the band continues to evolve with authentic energy and curiosity.
